Paul's primary emphasis is business litigation. He has practiced law for 25 years and his practice extends throughout the United States. Paul has tried cases to juries from Alaska to West Virginia, and many points in between. He has tried cases involving commercial contracts, sexual harassment claims, whistle-blower allegations, securities-fraud issues, non-competition and non-solicitation agreements, trade secrets violations, and many kinds of employment discrimination claims, including gender, disability, national origin, retaliation and age discrimination claims. As a former prosecutor, Paul has also tried many different kinds of criminal cases, ranging from simple misdemeanors to murder cases.

In the past several years, Paul has been hired to represent several different law firms in the Midwest to handle their litigation matters. He has also served as a mediator and arbitrator for many different kinds of employment litigation and commercial litigation cases.
